I've joined a groupchat named "Form & Discipline", and it's actually made to be a fan chat of a podcast about literary theory by a college student. Such convo as above happens daily, which this diary won't try to be of.

like my dog - more like my little brother - would sit by the table performing all tricks he know for human food which is extra to his surviving needs, the investment humans would make for mere pleasure from creating and reinforcing structures we've made us believe.

The Chart was actually about the importance of "Certain aspects of genetic relationships between dog populations, such as an east-west Eurasian differentiation, circumpolar connections, and possible basal lineages in the Near East, resemble features of human population history that were established before the earliest estimated dates of dog domestication. This superficial mirroring between the species may therefore instead point to recurrent population dynamics due to biogeographic or anthropological factors that remain to be understood. A key question is how dogs spread across Eurasia and the Americas by the Holocene, since no major human population movements have been identified after the initial out-of-Africa expansion that could have driven this global dispersal."

① Dog Domestication is Different from other Castles

② Dog's wild intrusion is different than etc pig, sheep...

③ colonization have affected dog breed we see nowadays
